Linguistics, Literature and Education

February 16-17

Preamble

In the current age of unparalleled worldwide interconnectedness, the importance of language transcends mere communication. It acts as a mirror reflecting diverse cultural landscapes and as a tool shaping our collective consciousness. The theme of our conference, "Bridging Words and Worlds," aims to delve into the intricate tapestry woven by language, literature, and education, revealing how these domains collectively influence and define human experience.

Our conference theme recognizes the dynamic and evolving nature of language and its profound impact on societal norms and individual identities. We seek to examine how linguistic nuances and literary narratives contribute to the rich fabric of cultural diversity, and how educational systems and practices can either reinforce or challenge these narratives.

This conference serves as a platform for scholars, educators, linguists, and literary enthusiasts from around the country to engage in meaningful discourse, share their research, and forge new connections. Together, we aim to deepen our understanding of how language and literature not only reflect our world but also have the power to transform it. Through this exploration, we hope to bridge not just words and worlds, but also minds and hearts.

Participants are invited to submit abstracts and prepare presentations that challenge conventional paradigms and introduce new methodologies in the study of linguistics, literature, and didactics. This includes but is not limited to explorations of emerging dialects, digital language trends, the role of literature in social and political movements, and the impact of globalization on educational frameworks. We also encourage discussions on how language and literature can be used as powerful tools for social change and educational empowerment.

We are excited to invite submissions that address, but are not limited to, the following topics:

- Linguistics and Cognitive Sciences: Studies on language acquisition, psycholinguistics, neurolinguistics, and the intersection of language with cognitive processes.
- Literary Studies and Cultural Analysis: Explorations of literary texts and genres, cultural narratives, and the role of literature in reflecting and shaping societal values and identities.

- Language Education and Pedagogy: Innovative teaching methodologies, language learning technologies, multilingual education, and challenges in language teaching and learning.
- Digital Humanities and Language Technologies: The impact of digital technologies on language, literature, and learning, including computational linguistics, text analysis, and digital literacy.
- Sociolinguistics and Language Diversity: Investigations into language use in social contexts, language policy, multilingualism, dialectology, and language preservation.
- Translation Studies and Intercultural Communication: Studies on translation theory and practice, the role of translation in cross-cultural understanding, and issues in interpreting.

- Literature and Education: Examining the role of literature in education, literary pedagogy, and the development of critical and creative thinking skills through literary studies.
- Language, Identity, and Power: Exploring the relationships between language, power, identity, and ideology in various social and political contexts.

We encourage interdisciplinary and innovative approaches to these topics, and we welcome submissions from researchers, educators, and practitioners at any stage of their careers. The conference provides an excellent opportunity for sharing your research, engaging in stimulating discussions and networking with peers from around the country.
